All baseball players who have played for Coach Hightower, recently or over the years, are encouraged to wear their jerseys. MGM colors are also welcome to be worn by all, as well as colors and jerseys from past teams he has coached.

Barry was passionate about out baseball, to say the least. Played professionally for six years in the '80s for the New York Mets and San Diego Padres until he had a career ending injury.

The same day he arrived home from playing ball, he immediately donned a baseball uniform, the same day, and began coaching and did not stop for the remainder of his life.

Barry received his Masters degree from Troy University and entered the field of education and has taught and coached solely around the State of Alabama.

He loved baseball. He loved coaching. He loved the kids. Coach Hightower has never been forgotten over the years while former players are always reaching out to catch up and share their lives with him. Several under his tutelage have gone on to play professionally, collegiately, and have become coaches themselves.

He is survived by his wife, Tammy Hightower; son, Cooper Hightower; stepson, Brandon Nelson.

He is preceded in death by his father, Lionel Hightower; mother, Phyllis Hightower.
